In Italy the Emperor's General Radetsky had needed no help. He quelled the sprising speedily and Francis Joseph followed the dual victory by promulgusing a new constitution. This totally failed to work, and two years later Austria became again an absolute deepotism.

The Emperor took "Viribus unitis" for his motto and let it be known that the litter was to be as highly centralized as France under Louis XIV. Hungary and all the other provinces were governed from Vienns.

In 1855 a concordat was concluded with the Pope by which extraordinary privileges were conferred on the Roman Catholic Church in Austria. The Austrian Emperor had the satisfaction of humiliating schleswig-Hoistein. The Austrian Emperor had the satisfaction of humiliating Italy, which took sides with Prussia, by decisive victories on land and sea, but this was small recompense for the crushing defeat sustained at the hands of the Prussians at Sadowa, or Koeniggrats. This one battle brought Francis of the Prussians at Sadowa, or Koenig-gratt. This one battle brought Francis.

The form of monarchy adopted then remains in force to-day, and generally the inethod of governing the dual monarchy is the same. There has been bitter strife since then, with incessant demands for reforms and continual disturbances in the legislative assembles, but the influences and strength of purpose of the Emperor have served to keep the empire together and even to retrieve much of the prestige lost in the Seven Weeks war.

The Emperor's last years, in addition to the dread of assassination and family troubles, were perpiexed by dissensions in his empire growing out of its inchoate components and complicated system of government. When he attained his seventy-fifth birthday, in August, 1905, it was rumored that he would abdicate in favor of his grandnephew, Charles Francis, son of Archduke Otto. Rumor cerred.

Simplest Monarch in Europe.

For many years Francis Joseph had been known as the simplest and most industrious monarch in Europe, as well as one of the shrewdest. During the latter part of his life he made his home exclusively at the distile at Schoenbrunn, going to the Hofburg in the capital for State business and formal entertainments. It was his custom to rise between 5 and haif past 5 o'clock and walk briskly in the gardens of the castle for briskly in the gardens of the castle for an hour and a half or so. On his re-turn he used to spend some time before breakfast in reading his "newspaper," made up by his secretaries of concen-trated extracts from the dallies of Eu-rope and containing only such news as trated extracts from the dallies of Europe and containing only such news as the secretaries thought would interest

The Emperor's generosity had as much to do with his popularity as his ability as a linguist, and his gifts to charities were lavish. It has been estimated that his civil list was worth perhaps something approaching $5,800,000 a year, but the demands upon it were not infrequently greater still.

The severest illness the Emperor sufclans advised that he go to the Riviera for the winter, but he refused with the impatiest answer:
